Recent developments in manufacturing techniques have enabled the production of capillary channels in nano and ångström scales, and this has enabled the production of nanoscale heat dissipaters. In the webinar, molecular / atomic level simulation studies developed to discover the important advantages of using nanoscale passive heat spreaders for electronic cooling, especially for chip level cooling, will be explained.